formation about the further shipments of gold. Frink & Beamen replied that they did not know anything about shipments of the precious metal, and would be delighted to find any of it. Then the direct inquiry was made by Wells & Co. of Frink & Beamen if they had not consigned $200,000 to Wells & Co. The answer came back that they had not.

This news turned things upside down THERE never was a job, said Detective Adams, worked in this country, which could match the great gold coin swindle so successfully carried out upon the expert dealer in money in Wall street. No class of people are easier to beat than Wall street assay office for analysis. This news turned things upside down in Wells & Co. s establishment. The gold which they had sold had been broken up into smaller packages and pretty widely distributed. Some of the coin was found and it was pronounced genuine by bank experts, but the deep interest of Wells & Co. aroused the suspicion of some of their customers, and they sent several samples to the assay office for analysis. This example are easier to beat than Wall street men, provided they are met upon their ination showed that there was practically only a trace of gold on the face
